I just came down like a sledgehammer on a woman who was foolish enough to ask me for a loan so she could become a millionaire. YEAH, RIGHT! Either she has been scammed or she IS a scammer, but I ain't no dummy either way!

About $2600. Seriously, like I just have that money laying around to throw at someone sexy who asks for it? WTF???

The girl in the picture isn't the one talking to you. I just searched the image and the REAL girl in this picture has NO idea the scammer is using her picture... it's on 5 different dating sites along with FB, twitter, and a few other sites and the backstory is different on each one. On one sight she lives in new York and her parents are from Peru. On another she lives in Fort Worth and her parents are from Australia. And on another she lives in Indiana and has lived there since she was 5 years old... the real scammer is in a computer cafe in a 3rd world country.

Thank you, Emily! I knew there was something suspicious about her when she suddenly had to go to South Africa last week rather than see me for the Memorial Day weekend.

I have found a Mexican porn site that contains many of the pics and even videos that woman in question sent me to gain my interest. I cannot link to it, however, due to fear of violating Facebook terms of service.

At least I can laugh at this farce, right?

Rule 1 of internet dating, if it's too good to be true, then it is. No probably.
I've had friends scammed out of lots of cash from beautiful women who want to date them, but in reality they aren't the kind of women who they had dated in real life. They are the kind of women they were rejected by in real life. That's the thing. Everyone has type's, even online. If that person would reject you at say a bar, then why are they suddenly interested online?
Also if they ask for money or won't do a live meeting, even on a real time camera, then they are likely fake.

I copied and stored EVERYTHING she sent me from her e-mails in a special file for future reference. That way, if I see her pics and similar messages being sent to me again, I will know it is another con artist instantly.
